The same announcements were made regarding the 2017 and 2018 papers as well as the meeting locations for the balance of the year. Dan handed out a flyer containing the dates and locations for the remainder of 2018; at either Fort Mason or the Mechanics Institute. Members are urged to check the website prior to attending a meeting as changes may occur. The financials were discussed with the papers publication being the largest recent expense. Dan noted that based on current expenditures, PCNS is funded for the next 11 years. A new member application was received from Michael J Carolan of Ely, Nevada and will be acted on next month if there are no objections.

Michael Wehner presented and displayed medals on a topic outside his usual collecting interest, "Awards Medals of the California Agricultural Society and its Precursors". James L.L.F Warren is considered the father of California Agriculture. A noted horticulturist and businessman from Boston moved to California during the gold rush of 1849 to establish a mining company. When that venture quickly fell apart, he established Warren and Company which specialized in selling fruit trees and seed products. The rooms above his store were called Agriculture Hall and were the location for the first California State Fair. The first medal on agriculture in California was likely an 1852 Warren & Son medal. By 1853, Warren has moved his business to San Francisco and held a second State Fair. In 1854 Warren start a newspaper in San Francisco, "The California Farmer" which remained in business until 2013. Over the years, California Agriculture medals would evolve, often changing names and depicted imagery similar to the California State Seal although with varying degrees of artistry. By 1956, the medal designs became modern until 1968 when the designs became more abstract. Eventually the medals were replaced by ribbons. Warren died in San Francisco in 1896 at the age of 90 although his legacy as the father of California Agriculture lives on in the fascinating agriculture medals as well as the ongoing California State Fairs and Cal Expo events.
