The board is requesting feedback from all members with regard to the printed version of the annual papers. The members in attendance discussed the pros and cons of publishing the 2019 papers electronically versus our standard booklet format and we want to hear from you. We appreciate all of Stephen's work over the years but producing the papers in two formats is a lot of work. Stephen is ready to pass on some responsibilities. If the membership feel strongly that they want to continue a print version, PCNS will need a volunteer to prepare the print layout work while Stephen has agreed to continue to prep for the papers for the PCNS website. Please send us your feedback on print versus electronic papers and if you are interested in preparing the print version. Your feedback will help the board make an informed decision.

Federico presented part three of his study of Latin American tokens titled - Token Denominations: Revisiting Latin American Tokens (Again!)

While United States tokens were mainly used in cities as a substitute for money, Latin American tokens were primarily used in rural areas and had more varied uses. City tokens were typically substitutes for money such as good-fors, entrance or transportation fares. Rural tokens were used for purposes other than to pay workers or suppliers. They were used as units of measure in agricultural tasks which could indicate weight, unit, volume, distance length of time or task. Examples include a cannasto token which was a basket used as a measure of volume for coffee cherries in Costa Rico or a limpia token from Guatamalla, a task token to clean an area of the field. A chopp token was a unit of liquid measure of beer. An arroba token from Mexico was a unit of weight that a burro could carry or about 25lbs. While a pasada token was a unit of distance, one trip across a river. Also, the same tokens had different a uses in a different countries. Federico did an excellent job of pulling together the complexity of Latin American tokens and that rural Latin American tokens were much more than a substitute for money.
